12. PIXELATED SELVES: NAVIGATING REALITY IN PATRICIA LOCKWOOD'S NO ONE IS TALKING ABOUT THIS

Ms. S. Afraa Dhawood Bi, Ms. M. AZRA

II M.A., Department of English, Jamal Mohamed College (Autonomous), Affiliated to Bharathidasan University, Tiruchirappalli – 620 020.

ABSTRACT

Patricia Lockwood's No One Is Talking About This is a persuasive expedition about the influence of social media on conscience, identity and emotional commitment of people on the digital age. The novel tells the story of an anonymous main character that has become famous for its spread of social networks, existing almost completely within the scope of digital called "information portal". Combined in the irony and efficiency of online culture, it experienced the great effects of the fish too much, in which humor, indignation and meaning are blurred in an endless content of the content. However, when a personal family crisis forced her to leave the virtual world, she faced the outstanding contrast between the digital existence and real experience, exposing the limits of online sympathy and the need for human real connection. Lockwood's fragmented and nonlinear account reflects the parade of social media, emphasizing how to communicate digital to form awareness, language and emotional reactions. The novel is criticized for the psychological and existential consequences of the super connected, asking questions about the authenticity of online interactions and the separation is preferred by digital space. This paper will analyze that No One Is Talking About This through the lens of digital communication theory, discovering digital dependent topics, commitments and tensions between virtual and real identity. By positioning novels as an important document in contemporary digital literature, this study emphasized how Lockwood grasped the paradoxes of the Internet culture, wondering whether connecting people could really exist an increasingly intermediary era by the screen.

Keywords: Social media, digital communication, online identity, hyperconnectivity, digital addiction and online empathy.

Patricia Lockwood, a famous poet and essayist with her special literary style, claimed to be an important voice in contemporary literature. With the context of both traditional literature and Internet culture, its text blends humor, irony and introvert to explore modern biological concerns. No One Is Talking About This (2021), her first novel, based on her own experiences as a personality of social media, offered a deep story and deeply tested on the path where digital communication shaped human identity and awareness. Lockwood's fragmented non -linear narrative reflects the discrete and fast nature of the Internet, making the novel a unique meditation of super connection, performing and separating emotions in the digital age.

The novel Is about an unnamed protagonist, who has gained Viral's popularity on a platform called "information portal", a clear replacement for Twitter or any other major social media network. As a deeply originated character in online culture, it thrives in the commitment, the development of full sarcasm to the purpose of the audience to search for entertainment and confirmation. The main character is proficient in the art of the Internet language, in which the meaning is compressed according to the statements that can be digested, often unreasonable to circulate quickly. She attended conferences where she was held for her information about digital discourse and her life revolved around the trend of monitoring, responding to global events with perfect jokes and maintaining an organized online personality. It is part of a generation that lives through screens, in which interactions are filtered through irony and separate layers, and the fleeting place in the reputation provides a meaning to the goal.

However, under the surface of its ultrasound existence is a discomfort under the secret. The main character began to ask questions about the authenticity of the connections that were established through the portal, feeling that despite the continuous flow of information, something important was missing. The Internet provides an illusion of commitment, but a large part of it feels empty, as if it and others were trapped in a performance cycle rather than real experience. It witnessed the way that the indignation, humor and tragedy were consumed and rejected quickly, reducing important moments for digital platforms. The main character began to wonder whether the portal, for all its entertainment and direct entertainment, was finally an actual flat insulating force rather than enriching it.

This existential question became inevitable when a crisis actually forced it to leave the portal and in the physical world. She received a new person that her younger sister's child was diagnosed with Proteus syndrome, a rare and deadly genetic disorder. Pregnancy becomes a deep emotional and painful experience of the family, and the protagonist finds himself no longer abstract and sarcasm about the internet and is pushed into a situation that requires real and unapproached presence. While spending time with her family, supporting her sister through the life and life of the child, she faced the emotions and experiences that social media could not encode. The outstanding contrast between the weight of this personal tragedy and the ban on the online discourse forces it to review the value of its digital existence.

The second half of the novel marks a change of tone and style, moving out of the discrete structure and rolls from the first half of an anchored and emotional story more smoothly. Lockwood is proficient in the way the unnamed character, once defined by her online character, began to separate herself from the portal and reconnect to the material world. The child, despite his short life, became a symbol of pure and unapproached reality, something that could not be packed in a tweet, reacting to a meme or goods by digital culture. Thanks to his niece, the main character experienced intimacy and connection depth that the Internet has never provided.

When she takes care of the baby, testifying both the great joy and the terrible pain of his short life, the protagonist realized that digital communication, such as advanced, could not replace the true presence of man. Social media, which seems to be a world that expands full of voice and interaction, now feels small and not enough to face the true human emotions. The experience of sadness, love and loss cannot be done or condensed in the limited language of the portal. It must be experienced, felt and endured in a deep and often indescribable way. Lockwood prose reflects this change, from hyperactive observations to slower paths and more reflexes allowing the weight of the emotion of the main character to resolve. Lockwood criticized the nature of digital participation, arguing that even when the Internet provides a connection, it is often a form of superficial performance that cannot replace real relationships. The novel raises the question of the impact of super connection on human empathy-the testimony to endure through the screen that makes people more compassionate, or are they sensitive to them? Is the Internet a tool for significant communication, or does it even reduce the deepest experience of consuming content? By positioning the main character between these two worlds, Lockwood emphasizes the paradox of contemporary life: we are involved in digital spaces; the more we are disconnected to our own emotions.

However, No One Is Talking About This is not completely refusing social media or digital communication. Lockwood realized that the Internet, despite being at fault, changed the way people live in the world, better or worse. It has allowed the forms of expression, humor and new connection, but it has also changed the way people deal with reality. The main character's journey does not include completely abandoning the digital domain, but to recognize its limits. At the end of the novel, she was aware of the meaning of actually present, and understood that if the portal provided a loud voice network, it could not replace the depth of a human communication.

In the end, No One Is Talking About This serves both satirical and elegant for the Internet era. Lockwood's novel captures absurdity, brightness and emotion in the field of digital, making it one of the deepest literary discoveries on the impact of social media on human consciousness. The novel requires readers to reflect on their own relationship with the Internet, wondering if their identity number is shaped by digital space and if connected can actually exist in a world that is increasingly announced by the screen. By combining the online character's online existence with his real confrontation with sadness and love, Lockwood presented a strong comment on the meaning of man in the era of super connection.

Lockwood's novel is both an example and a criticism of contemporary digital culture, reflecting the way the Internet has shaped the way people communicate, treat emotions and build their identity. The unnamed character, who has found a goal and is confirmed in the endless flow of the information portal, began to realize his limit when faced with the rough intensity of the real experience. This change emphasizes the central tension of the novel between the fleeting nature of digital interactions and the existence of human emotions such as love and sadness. The fragmented style of the novel imitates the roll experience, strengthens the way of thinking and the attention of digital space fragmentation. However, while the unnamed main character moves out of the information portal, the language of the novel becomes more anchoring, symbolizing the return to reality. The last novel wondered if the Internet could never really grasp the depth of human existence or if it simply provided a distorted version and pixel of life. Lockwood did not completely condemn the digital space, but urged a deeper reflection on how they shaped awareness. No One Is Talking About This is a profound exploration of super connection, showing that if the Internet facilitates the conversation and connection is always outside the screen.

Works cited

[1] Lockwood, Patricia. No One Is Talking About This. Riverhead Books, 2021.

[2] Lockwood, Patricia. No One Is Talking About This. Kindle ed., Riverhead Books, 2021.

[3] Smith, Zadie. "On the Internet's Language and the Limits of Connection." The New York Review of Books, 25 Mar. 2021, www.nybooks.com/articles/2021/03/25/patricia-lockwood-no-one-talking-about-this/.

[4] Turner, Laura. "Hyperconnectivity and Existential Detachment in Patricia Lockwood's No One Is Talking About This." Journal of Digital Humanities and Literature, vol. 12, no. 2, 2022, pp. 45-67.